

WASHINGTON, DC (AP) — A 2011 report by the Obama administration says about 20 to 30 percent of the country's total forest land could be lost by 2050 unless federal agencies and states take action to protect the land. The report says that about 100 million acres of forest land are at risk, and that the loss could be as high as 200 million acres by 2050. The report also says that the loss of forest land could have a significant impact on the environment, including the loss of biodiversity and the release of carbon into the atmosphere.